"Who is more satisfied? The man with ten children or the man with ten million dollars?" One student answered: "The man with ten children." When asked why, the student replied, "Because the man with ten children doesn't want any more."

Someone wrote to Ann Landers: "Dear Ann: I've got to decide between the new car and getting engaged. I love the girl. But every night when I go to sleep I dream about the car. What should I do?"

Found in national classified ads: "I would like to meet a kind, cheerful, responsive girl of no more than 25 years old. One of the conditions of a future mate: a move to the Polar North region." Another stated: "HERE I AM unusual and good looking 37-year-old woman, sitting alone in my Manhattan apt. wondering where all the aware, caring, generous, stable, and adventurous gentlemen are.

We are a people looking for fulfillment and identity and relationships in all the wrong places: the classifieds, the back pages of life, our work and possessions, and now even the internet. I know I don't need to explain "MySpace" to the current generation, but for the sake of many readers, "MySpace" is a website filled with over 70 million interactive, personal webpages and blogs. It's something like the old-fashioned personal pages in the newspaper (when news came on paper), but it's more like 70 million personal diaries, all hung out there for the world to read. At a deeper level, it's a metaphor for our lives. Finding "MySpace" is a search for our place in the world. We all search to find an identity, search to know who we are and where we belong. Ultimately, we find "MySpace" in the values we hold, the convictions, commitments, and beliefs which guide our lives; and the loves, thoughts, and other things which define us. Finding "MySpace" is all about finding out who we are.

As Christians, this space becomes sacred as we cast our lot with the people of God and say, "Yes, I will be a disciple of Jesus Christ. I will allow my values to be shaped by His life and my life will be shaped by His love."

When we choose to become a disciple of Jesus, when we log-on with the body of Christ, we are automatically connected to the "World Wide Web" of faith and become one with all who proclaim the name of Jesus Christ.

And it's not just about our personal faith, our personal identity, our personal space, or our personal church. Finding MySpace is also about connecting to our place in the world-wide, global family of God around the city, around the country, and around the world.
